Public Facing Advocacy Writing

The latest issue of Corrections Today, a publication of the American Correctional Association, is devoted to green initiatives in the field, from physical plant improvements and environmentally savvy restorative-justice projects to entrepreneurship and developing a sustainable corrections system. Leah Morgan, the coordinator of Veras Ohio Green Prison Project, contributed to this issue with her article, Green Job Training in Prisons Benefits Everyone.

Many of the articles focus on the benefit to corrections agencies and their budgets of sustainability initiatives. In contrast, Leah's article demonstrates the importance of green efforts to job training and reentry planning for inmates. Leah describes the importance of Veras partnership with the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction and the steps that departments of corrections and facilities can take to adopt a greener approach in operations as one part of a green job-training and reentry planning program. This ambitious project has great potential to make facilities more environmentally neutral and provide meaningful job prospects for incarcerated men and women returning to the community.
