Witness Against Torture

Torture, Former Combatants, Political Prisoners, Terror Suspects, & Terrorists

https://witnessagainsttorture.com/prisoner/ravil-mingazov/

Campaign and Advocacy

Russian Ballet Dancer, Held Without Charge at Guantnamo Since 2002

Ravil Mingazov has been held at Guantnamo Bay without charge since 2002. He was born in Russia in 1967, became a ballet dancer with several dance troupes, was conscripted into the Russian army at 19 and first served in the Army ballet troupe. After his conscription ended in 1988, he served voluntarily until 1996 and later returned to the military in the food supply section, where he took over a program which was in bad shape and transformed it into a model program, the best in all the Armys. He was rewarded with a watch.

Apparently his troubles began when he converted to Islam in the army, amidst general intolerance towards Muslim soldiers. When Ravil asked for fair treatment, such as halal food and time for worship, it was denied. When he sought assistance outside the military, his commanders retaliated, the KGB stepped up surveillance and his house was ransacked.

Now married to a Muslim woman and with a young son, Ravil sought a country where they could practice their religion in peace. He traveled alone first to Tajikistan, then to Afghanistan, then fled that country after the U.S. invaded, arriving in Pakistan. He was living in a house for Muslim refugees when the Pakistani police arrived and arrested everyone, apparently because someone in the house supposedly knew Abu Zubaydah. Ravil had no connection with him.

The police turned him over to the Americans who sent him to Bagram prison, where he was badly treated. After a Red Cross officer told him that prisoners were treated humanely at Guantnamo, Ravil made up some stories so that the Americans would think he was someone important and send him to GTMO; what he feared most was to be sent back to Russia, as he knew hed be badly treated there. Later in 2006 in Guantnamo he tried to correct those stories.

Since 2002 he has been held at Guantnamo; he has never been charged with anything. In April 2010 Judge Henry Kennedy of the US District Court for the District of Columbia issued a comprehensive 42-page opinion methodically analyzing each piece of evidence presented by the government, and concluding that, after eight years of detention, the government failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that Mingazov was a part of or substantially supported al-Qaeda or the Taliban. (Quoted from The National Law Journal.) The judge ordered him released on May 13, 2010, under the writ of habeas corpus. The government appealed. Allison Lefrak, the litigation officer at Human Rights USA, who visits Ravil every three months, says The U.S. Court of Appeals has not affirmed a single decision ordering the release of a detainee.

In the meantime, Ravil is still at Guantnamo. As of January 2010, the Guantnamo Review Task Force had recommended him for prosecution, but he has yet to be charged with a crime. He has not been able to see his wife or son, who have found refuge in Britain. After Shaker Aamer was released, his family started working to push for Ravils release to the UK as well. Read more about that campaign here.

After hearing about the earthquake in Haiti, Ravil organized a food drive of unopened containers of food to be sent to the Haitian people. He told his lawyer, Gary Thompson, that he wanted to be the last person to leave Gitmo, after everyone else had had a chance to leave. He continues to practice his Muslim faith ardently. He says, These walls cannot contain me because the only true garden is the one you grow in your heart.