Human Rights Watch

Torture, Former Combatants, Political Prisoners, Terror Suspects, & Terrorists

https://www.hrw.org/news/2013/12/19/dispatches-tired-torturetirades-tashkent

Campaign and Advocacy

Help us continue to fight human rights abuses. Please give now to support our work

Share this via Facebook Share this via Twitter Share this via WhatsApp Share this via Email

Other ways to share

Share this via LinkedIn

Share this via Reddit Share this via Telegram Share this via Printer

State-controlled and state-affiliated media in Uzbekistan are not sources I often turn to for scoops on whats actually happening inside the country. Censorship in authoritarian Uzbekistan is near complete, and pro-government outlets know that those who dare to report on politically sensitive topics end up harassed, imprisoned, and tortured or worse.

Thats what made it all the more fascinating today that Uzmetronom, a Tashkent-based news outlet known for its close tiesto Uzbekistans security services, ran an articlecritical of the governments chief spokesman on human rights issues, Akmal Saidov.

A well-recognized figure who has long enjoyed the support of President Islam Karimov, Saidov leads nearly every Uzbek government delegation to various United Nations treaty bodies that deal with human rights. He also often represents the government in its bilateral meetings on human rights with the US, the EU, and other international partners.

Todays article ridicules Saidov for his recent handling of hearings before the UN Committee against Torture, a body made up of internationally recognized experts who review countries obligations under the Convention against Torture. At the October meeting on Uzbekistan, Saidov adopted a familiar strategy: not only did he refuse to acknowledge Uzbekistans serious torture epidemic and continued imprisonment of human rights defenders, Saidov yelled, screamed and banged his fist passionately on the table while doing so.

The Uzmetronom piece lambasts Saidov for his theatrics and also states that his work as the governments spokesman on human rights is aimed at allowing Uzbekistan to imitate a commitment on the part of the government to universal human values.

Saidovs performance was certainly nothing new diplomats and observers have witnessed his antics for years and such tactics did not prevent the committee from issuing scathing conclusions. The only difference this time was that Saidovs tirades were caught on video and circulated widely in the independent Uzbek media.

But if Saidov was behaving business-as-usual, what made Uzmetronom criticize him this time around?

Some may point to the reports of political wrangling in the capital, Tashkent, between secret services chief Rustam Inoyatov and Gulnara Karimova, the presidents daughter. Is the unusual public attack on Saidov a sign of waning support, at least within some government circles, for President Karimovs bombastic handling of Uzbekistans atrocious human rights record?

As always with Uzbekistan, analysts are left trying to read the tea leaves, with scant hard information available. About the only thing that is clear is that Tashkent should adopt a more serious approach to its rights record, address the longstanding problem of torture, and immediately release the countrys many political prisoners.

If this represents the end of fist-banging denials, it would be no bad thing.

Censorship and Freedom of the Media in Uzbekistan

Forced and Child Labor Linked to World Bank Group Investments in Uzbekistan

Share this via Facebook Share this via Twitter Share this via WhatsApp Share this via Email

Other ways to share Share this via LinkedIn Share this via Reddit Share this via Telegram Share this via Printer

Human Rights Watch defends the rights of people in 90 countries worldwide, spotlighting abuses and bringing perpetrators to justice Get updates on human rights issues from around the globe. Join our movement today.

Human Rights Watch is a 501(C)(3)nonprofit registered in the US under EIN: 13-2875808