Our Weekly Roundup of News and Views on Solitary Confinement

by Lizzie Kane | April 6, 2021

According to a February 19 article from the Davis Vanguard, incarcerated individuals in the California Medical Facility are suffering from mental health problems due to a lockdown that was imposed in an effort to slow the spread of COVID-19, but has resulted in the solitary confinement of people with physical and mental health issues.

The Guardian commemorated Angola 3 member Albert Woodfoxs fifth anniversary of freedom from solitary confinement with a profile on him published on February 19.

ICE detention centers in Louisiana and Texas have been exposed for having solitary confinement cells without heat, according to reporting from the Intercept on February 19. On top of the lack of heat, guards were reportedly turning fans on individuals who complained about the cold.

According to an article from February 23 in the Lens, incarcerated individuals at Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola went on a hunger strike to protest the disciplinary segregation some people have been held in for longer than the prisons disciplinary protocols call for.

On February 25, the City reported that New York Citys Board of Correction had ruled that a group of young adults should be kept in isolation, despite Mayor Bill de Blasios promise to end solitary confinement in New York Citys jails. The City then reported on March 8 that some criminal justice advocates are unhappy with de Blasios plan, believing that the name solitary confinement is being changed instead of making genuine reforms. The proposed changes involve an increased amount of out-of-cell time in punitive segregation, but stays in segregation can be indefinite.

In an op-ed for Newsweek on February 26. Tammie Gregg, the director of the ACLUs Stop Solitary Campaign, argued that then-nominee for U.S. attorney general Merrick Garland needs to finish former President Barack Obamas work reducing and reforming solitary confinement.

National Campaign Strategist for Unlock the Box Jessica Sandoval talked with producer Sue Goodwin on WPFWs Monday Morning QB on March 1 about ending solitary confinement and why the practice is not an effective method to contain the spread of COVID-19.

On March 2, the Connecticut Examiner reported that the nonprofit Disability Rights Connecticut filed a lawsuit on behalf of three incarcerated individuals, arguing that people with mental illness should not be put in prolonged segregation or in-cell restraints. Currently, there is a proposed bill in Connecticut called the PROTECT Act that would address this issue, among others. The advocacy group Stop Solitary CT wrote an op-ed in the Hartford Courant on February 22, asserting that the PROTECT Act should be passed. Direct testimony from incarcerated individuals in CT who have been in solitary can be found here.

In an opinion piece for Jacobin from March 2, freelance writer and cofounder of Cornells Prison Reform and Education Project Garrison Lovely outlined why solitary confinement should be banned in its entirety. The article referenced William Blakes recent piece published on Solitary Watch.

According to a press release from the office of Texas State Representative Terry Meza on March 3. Meza filed two bills related to solitary confinement: one proposes limiting isolation to 10 consecutive days, while the other proposes a study be conducted on the use of segregation in the state and its effects on incarcerated individuals.

The nonprofits Freedom for Immigrants and the Immigrant Action Alliance filed lawsuits in March on behalf of Kevin Brown and Kemar Williamstwo Jamaican nationals being held in the Glades County ICE Detention Centerwho have said they were being beaten, maced, and placed in solitary confinement, as reported by the Miami New Times on March 9. The men were reportedly in solitary confinement at the time of publication due to having extra toilet paper rolls and an extra laundry bag. Williams, because of his time in solitary, is attempting to voluntarily go back to Jamaica.

According to an article from the Crime Report on March 10, in a recent report, researchers at Florida State University found that individuals with mental illness were significantly more likely to be placed in long-term solitary confinement. More details about the study were published on Phys.org.

On March 12, in an op-ed for the Baltimore Brew, Brian Levyan Assistant Public Defender in the Youthful Defender Unit of the the Baltimore Public Defenders Officeargued that children are being held in solitary confinement under abominable conditions at the Baltimore Youth Detention Center. The facility had a recent COVID-19 outbreak, which led to the widespread implementation of solitary confinement.

On March 29, the Atlantic published the second article in what will be a five-part series by Solitary Watchs Jean Casella, Katie Rose Quandt, and Sarah Shourd on the epidemic of deaths in U.S. jails. Written by Quandt, the article takes a look at the details behind the deaths of various individuals at Kentuckys Boyd County Detention Center and other local jails in rural communities and small towns and cities. She reports on the rapid growth of the jail populations in these areas, which vastly outpaces the number of beds and resources available, leading to overcrowding, abusive treatment, medical neglect, and preventable deaths. jails.

In the weeks leading up to the passage of the Humane Alternatives to Long-Term (HALT) Solitary Confinement ActNew Yorks groundbreaking bill to end prolonged solitary confinement and the topic. Gothamist and the Times Union both reported on the persistent and ubiquitous problems with solitary confinement in New York and across the U.S.

Also leading up to the passage of HALT, the New York Times published an editorial and former United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture Juan Mendez wrote an op-ed for the Journal News, both calling for New York Governor Andrew Cuomo to end long-term solitary confinement by signing HALT.

Governor Andrew Cuomo signed the HALT Solitary Confinement Act into law on March 31, Setting in motion an end to prolonged solitary confinement in New Yorks state prisons and local jails. The New York Times covered passage of the historic legislation, and the governor, who had for years opposed the bill, put out a press release celebrating the new law.

Writing for the New York Times opinion section, Ian Manuel discussed the 18 years he spent in solitary confinement starting when he was 15 years old arguing that juvenile solitary confinement be outlawed in America.
